Under a law passed in 2009, the new authority is called the Center for Medicare and Medicaid Services, and it will be led by the agency's current director, Donald M. Berwick, who previously led the agency that runs Medicare. Mr. Berwick, an academic who was a pioneer of health care reform in Massachusetts and the architect of the Medicare program there, has been the public face of the overhaul of the nation's health care system since taking the helm in 2009. The new center has spent the past three years consolidating its power to oversee the health care system. Its latest moves include putting a new director, Marilyn Tavenner, in charge of the program that is at the center of the fight in Congress over the health care law's new subsidies for insurance. "It's critical that Congress supports the investments needed to expand coverage and improve the quality of care for all Americans," said Marilyn Tavenner, who was the administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services until Mr. Berwick's appointment, which was announced this month. And the center also has taken a prominent role in a recent fight over health care legislation, including a letter it sent to Representative Dave Camp, Republican of Michigan, the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, to explain that Mr. Berwick is a neutral arbiter and to offer advice on the legislation. The new center will have broad authority over both the new federal health care law and the government's other health care programs. It will pay providers and manage hospitals, nursing homes, clinics and other medical providers. It will also run a program to give extra federal money to help pay for insurance and offer another program to pay for health care for low-income people. It will even get involved in how doctors and hospitals are paid, which is where much of the pushback against
