The code is primarily designed for finite element analysis on unstructured meshes. It can be used for multi-physics coupled problems. In its formulation, Ux-C-3 is based on an original approach combining the isogeometric method with Galerkin Finite Element for the solution of the governing equations. The isogeometric approach is often used for complex analysis problems such as those arising from continuum mechanics, thermal-fluid, or multiphase flow, or for the design and optimization of advanced products. The mechanical and thermal-fluid components of the problem are analyzed using a coupled formulation and thus become non-intrusive in the meshes used for the geometric description of the domains. The coupled formulation requires the specification of boundary conditions and input parameters that are automatically transferred to the geometry and topology of the mesh. In this new version, Ux-C-3 is coupled with a feature-based implicit-form approach of the differential quadrature method allowing the implementation of complex, non-linear or time-varying friction laws and the calculation of the plastic deformation of components in the solid domain. The coupled formulation is validated with verification and optimization codes and has been proven effective for different applications. In this new version, Ux-C-3 provides a new construction for the calculation of the surface area and shape of non-linear solids in the ANSYS Workbench which will be accelerated and optimized. The new version of Ux-C-3 also includes some new capability options that can be used for cost reduction in the design and manufacture of advanced structures. Ux-C-3 is an excellent general-purpose code for simulating important problems in elasticity, thermo-fluid, and multiphase flow. Together with the MSEF format used for isogeometric simulation, Ux-C-3 is now one of the most widely adopted solutions by the industrial community. 2 out of 5 download_link Local Informer: Program Files/Plugins Installed Size Cr
