& More I am starting to finish all the human characters - including wizards! Now, all that remains are freehand backgrounds. But before the backgrounds leave the pan, I want to talk about the art. Nothing special - just things I have learned or practices over the years that have helped to improve my art. I think each artist has their own take on how to draw an individual characters nose & eyes. For me, I have always been about fighting for the nose. No matter what angle the nose is held at, it always looks the same. So when I was first learning how to draw noses, I drew lots and lots of different ones. I would think to myself, "Oh, I must have drawn that nose a hundred times." I even started coloring my comics in crayon, so I could just practice the nose over and over and over again - just to get it right. There is something about that nose that keeps drawing my eyes. I have never been willing to sacrifice the nose for the sake of getting the eye right. It isn't that my drawing of the eye is bad (I mean, on the surface it looks good), but something about the way I draw the nose keeps drawing my eye right back to it. I really don't know why. But if I am not willing to work for the nose, then the rest of the character is worthless. If my work is not the best, then my work is not worth anything. So, I have just followed that philosophy all through the painting process. I have always approached my drawing with the "baseball player test." If I get at least five people who are on the same page as me and can't figure out what I meant to say, then my art is not good enough. If I can't draw your nose and eyes, my work doesn't really mean very much. Here are a few ideas that make my art better (besides saying them out loud.) Slightly rounded eyes Noses that I know are not going to look right in perspective Not drawing the mouth Ruling out the hair Useful tools Super-clarity Three fingers under the nose Drawing, polishing and toning Letting drawings dry and air dry Positive self-image Improving stuff "Fighting" for the nose Practice, practice, practice The
