The Legend of the Tetrarchs (or Storia di tutte le tetrarchie), also known as the History of all the tetrarchs, is a Byzantine narrative about the succession of Roman Emperors, originating in a Greek work dating from ca. 700. It continued in Byzantium until 1453, when it was used by Italian writers to help put an end to the interregnum and reveal that Byzantium was heir to the mantle of Italy. While an ostensible reason for the continuation of the legend was the presence of the Roman imperial regalia in Constantinople, it was also an explanation for why the Byzantine Empire never surrendered to the Muslim assault in the First Crusade. The former reason is also given by Constantine VII at the conclusion of his Apokalypse, but in a more reputable way, as follows: Furthermore, although nowhere in the general opinion of the historians are there any grounds for believing that the Byzantine emperors had ever the intention of doing so, and that they meant only to keep themselves free from the dangers under which they had been placed, to use the occasion of the absence of Christendom on the side of the Turks to lead the actual inhabitants of the Holy Land out of their sufferings, much less to conquer in fact all Western Europe, yet the errors of the belief, which was not without force and might have presented a lofty appearance and justified a lofty hope, and the catastrophes to which it led, together with the reports which were sent to Europe and the capital of the Empire by European travellers, were the motives, and not the absence of the eikon at Constantinople, for the exclamation on the part of many monasteries of the churches of the East, when they witnessed the dispersion of the relics of the Cross, of which—as it has been seen—Christ himself had preserved only one in his own keeping. There was indeed a certain legend told of the Emperor Heraclius, and also of Michael VIII Palaeologus, which states that neither of the two, when he made war against the Saracens, left Constantinople because the holy image was not in the capital; and this was a cause of great rejoicing to the people, because they believed that their Empire should be indissolubly united with all the churches of Christendom. History and importance The history was first written in old Greek about 700, but continued to be used until at least the late 14th century
