The game will show augmented reality overlays of player data during gameplay, including many real-time statistics and player attributes. The new system will ensure that players are closely tracked at all times. As a result, the system builds a representation of the player, and the player will then transfer all the information to the pitch, which will be displayed on large, dynamic displays, including the playing surface. On the pitch, players will be able to see their past actions and physicality, as well as their availability to their teammates. Players will also have access to features that make up the FIFA Ultimate Team experience, such as the ability to talk to the mobile coach during the game to give their opinion on the best play. Other items that will be displayed include a health bar, which is designed to mimic the real-world functionality of the real-life equivalent. After helping build the new game for a multitude of professional clubs and international teams, including Manchester United, Barcelona, Real Madrid, Bayern Munich and Juventus, EA Sports has been developing the new features and mechanics. "FIFA 14 had the most individual fan interaction of any video game in history, and that's exactly what we wanted to do with FIFA 22 and the FIFA Ultimate Team experience," said Domenico Scala, SVP of International Soccer. "We wanted to do that while making sure that we stayed true to the game, and that's why our development team has been working on the new technology that is connected to the gameplay to make sure that we include aspects like attacking patterns that are so vital to us in the sport." During the "Ultimate Team" modes, fans will be able to create their ideal team and compete against other players around the world to be the ultimate champion. In addition, FIFA 22 will feature a wealth of improvements to the game engine, including an increase in detailed graphics while maintaining the speed of play, and the introduction of an entirely new ball physics. Fans will be able to track their favorite player's footwork and movement thanks to the use of motion capture and a high-definition camera to capture all the movement on the pitch. The highly detailed player models will help players see the exact location of their teammates in the real-world game and see the exact location of the ball. With a shift in how the ball moves, players will be able to track
