What's new:

Rawhide's debut Australian brochure is about as good a read as any. Of the 22 artists on show, only a handful have seen the light of day in this country. Together they will form the backbone of what, I can only guess, will be a body of work like no other. The fall of 2008 is proving to be banner time for the art scene in Melbourne. On the one hand we have the now infamous works by a prolific New Zealand artist who has struck on a Gallipoli theme. A tidal wave of public interest will eventually wash over his slowly growing body of work. But just down the road, at least for the time being, lies the new Tate Modern, providing a world class exhibition venue for work that will surely command the interest of the wider Australian art fraternity. Together they will form the backbone of what, I can only guess, will be a body of work like no other. The wide-spanned ideals of the ambitious Shannon Firestone seem to be reflected in the overall direction of her work. There is a sense of longing and an eye for the dramatics of the human condition. Equally what unites the mixed media ranges is that they manage to blur the lines between formal boundaries. Firestone herself, listed as an Associate of the National Art School in New South Wales, discusses her approach. "I allow myself plenty of time to create and if I don't get bored then there is a problem," she says. A graduate of the 2005 exhibition at the La Trobe University, Firestone has recently been in residence at Australia's National Art School in Surry Hills. She feels lucky to have the room and time to create and lets her imagination run riot without the confines of time and budgetary restraints. The environment, she says, gets her in the creative zone. Taking a certain degree of risk, she has recently smashed glass and poured water across her studio floor. A recent example has been the works that have had their ephemeral elements left out there to be discovered by the elements, cut off at the neck and eventually flushed down the toilet. Perhaps for a different type of artist, this would not be a project to undertake. But Firestone sees this as a positive process in her creative life. "It can be really uplifting and you can see the
