Version 5 comes with a few caveats – such as the inability to open and edit notes in older versions, and the fact that the old version of Lightroom cannot create new albums from an existing pool of images. Unfortunately, there's still a dark side to Lightroom, and that comes in the form of a lack of features. Here are some problems I've encountered. First off … the image quality has been adversely affected by reducing the number of channels in the image. Lightroom won't allow you to throw away any of the color channels, so in order to increase sharpness, you'll have to sometimes choose between clarity and contrast. Change the histogram between the channels and Photoshop Elements will still offer 3 modes, which are hard to decide between. If you don't know what you're doing, you'll probably end up with a picture that looks more like a design than a photo. The new Spot Removal mode, which tries to find objects and remove them automatically using the camera's exposure information, assigns too much weight to areas with a lot of local contrast (such as bright and dark spots on old film). They're better off being removed by hand. The same goes for new Spot Healing Brush and Spot Healing Edge tools. Adobe has been an important component of my workflow for the last decade, and I'm happy to see that now features and functions I'm accustomed to, and appreciate, will be a part of Creative Cloud.
I've been an iPhone and iPad user - and will continue to be - but the option to communicate and collaborate across platforms is now an important part of my day to day workflow. Whether I'm communicating directly or commenting on someone's work in the comments panel, I have the satisfaction that comes with embracing something that was initially a tool, and now a part of my professional life.
